Excerpt: . CHAPTER XI CONCLUSION: GENERAL APPLICATIONS Cooperation of educational agencies.--After this study of the sources of conduct and their specific bearing on special phases of the problem of moral education, it might be well to look at this matter from the side of the school curriculum and the other machinery of education, with the purpose of determining what can actually be done, in a general way, in the application of our knowledge of the principles studied. It is needless to say that if the greatest possible degree of success is ever to be obtained, there must be a cooperation of all those factors that can in any way influence the growing child. No doubt the time will come when society will make it impossible for the scandalous yellow newspaper or the inane, insipid comic supplement of the Sunday paper, or the abominable dime novel,...
