Extract of a Letter from A.H. Edgren, Professor of Languages, University of Nebraska. A visit to Mexico is, indeed, full of uncommon interest, historical, ethnical, archaeological and linguistic, to say nothing of the joys of a magnificent scenery and a lovely climate. The charm of breathing not only the air of a foreign country but also of a past age, is more fully realized in Mexico than even in Spain or Italy, and the sight of a native American race working its way to intelligent independence and a modern civilization on the ruins of their old culture is to me full of deepest interest. Unfortunately for the traveler, though not for Mexico, the mediaeval spirit still lingering over the country will have disappeared in a few more years. I noticed a very decided difference, in this regard, between Mexico...
