Fire Administration, National Fire Data Center, 2003. OCLC Number: (OCoLC)77080138 Subject: Fire extinction -- Accidents. Excerpt: . . . USFA-TR-100 May 2003 3 BACKGROUND The purpose of this report is to identify key concerns regarding the hazards of firefighter training and to explore how the training hazards have changed. A goal of this report is to help fire departments reduce these hazards by offering suggestions based on the experiences of the study participants. Since behavior on the fireground is closely related to behavior on the training ground or drill field, it stands to reason that correcting safety-related issues during firefighter training should translate into fewer fireground injuries and deaths. A well-known fire department saying is: train as you fight and fight as you train. This report examines the state of safety in firefighter training as widely conducted in the United States. The results of this research are intended to help fire departments identify training hazards, improve the safety of trainees, and provide more effective and safe practical training. Although it is impossible to identify every training hazard, this report will analyze several of the most common hazards encountered during training evolutions. Some suggestions for addressing these hazards also are included. The broad nature of this topic, combined with the limited amount of available data, necessitated that project staff solicit information from a variety of sources. To ensure broad input for the report, interviews were conducted with administrators, trainers, and other fire department personnel concerned with fire-rescue training. These interviews were informal, but structured as guided discussions. Several meetings were conducted with local and state fire training officers to obtain information and develop a subjective sense...
