Excerpt: . marking the outgoing and the incoming of the two most remarkable phenomenal aspects of the physical history of our planet--and the products of which, garnered up in ages long past, are now so essential to our progress in art, science, and commercial enterprise. The fishes up to this period are all of a type, and are modelled according to a special plan, both in the scaly envelope and osseous structure. The interior skeleton is composed of cartilage, and the outward covering of true bone, the scales, fins, tail, and external plates of the head being all constructed of bony material. The back-bone, or dermal ridge, extends to the extremity of the tail-fin, thus at once adding strength to the cartilaginous body, and giving a greater degree of propelling power to its caudal organ. It is hence called Heterocercal, in contrast with all existing fishes whose back-bone terminates within the tail-fin, and is therefore termed the Homocercal, or equally-lobed structure. The existing ray, shark, and sturgeon are exceptional cases. Hence in these and in some other respects, especially in their dentition, Agassiz remarks that the fishes of this period all partake, more or less, of the characters which, at a later time, are exclusively found in reptiles, and no longer belong to the fishes of the present day. They are therefore classed among the Order of Sauroids, to denote their reptilian affinities; and thus Agassiz considers that the earliest fishes are rather the oldest...
