The sob of grief from the lowliest dwelling falls not on their ears without striking corresponding chords in their hearts, and awakening emotions of generous sympathy. Even the tear which trembles on the cheek of the little wanderer, passing along with lonely and sad steps through our thronged streets, is not unmarked by such; and, prompted by the workings of a noble spirit, the question is heard - what aileth thee, child, that thou dost weep? If such is the effect of the comparatively trifling and every-day scenes of life - if the grief which presses upon a single family, or a single heart, inspires such interest, what must be the effect on a benevolent mind, of beholding vast multitudes clothed in the garments of mourning, and of...
