Not illustrated. 1914 Excerpt: .for accuracy holds within itself one of the most important of all educative elements, for without the power to concentrate there can be no intellectual supremacy. Indeed, someone has said that the measure of intellectual power is simply the measure of the power of concentration. If manual training possesses such value in the educative process it is the teacher s duty to make use of it whenever and wherever possible. These same exercises express an idea in material form, in other words the pupil makes something. This compels him to first assemble his subconscious, hazy concepts into a clear and definite picture of the thing in mind, --more concentration. He must then organize his work and step by step work out the project. This develops his power of initiative, crystallizes his imagination and compels a logical sequence of thought and procedure. He thinks things through; he sees the end from the beginning; his thinking becomes systematic, and systematic thinking gives mental power. CHARACTER BUILDING. Manual training is also a powerful factor in the building of character, developing as it does perseverance, self-reliance, originality, and individuality, those sturdy elements of character so necessary to success in life. The ordinary grade pupil cannot see the disastrous effects of incorrect computations in arithmetic, and therefore he must be driven to that repetition of work necessary for the habit of accuracy. But he can see the crooked line, the imperfect curve, the open joint, and in consequence he can appreciate...
